- Document A -

This is an edited extract of a note by Taoiseach Seán Lemass to the secretary of his Department.

Telefís Éireann had a discussion on the Second Programme for Economic Expansion last evening. During it, criticisms were expressed, some of which were misleading, not to mention being shallow and unconstructive.

I wish to have the RTÉ Authority approached, to inquire what arrangements they have in mind to enable those criticisms and misrepresentations to be corrected.

RTÉ's function in this matter should be, primarily, to support the Programme rather than to facilitate criticism; and, certainly, criticism must not be allowed to go unanswered.

If there is any resistance on the part of the Authority, please let me know and I will deal with it.

- Document B -

In this edited extract from his autobiography León Ó Broin, secretary of the Department of Posts and Telegraphs (1948-1967), comments on Lemass's approach to RTÉ.

Lemass threatened to be critical of Telefís Éireann from the start, not the programmes themselves but the RTÉ Authority's attitude to public policy.

He made this clear to Michael Hilliard, Minister for Posts and Telegraphs (1959-1965), who seemed frightened whenever Lemass called him on the phone and I happened to be in the room. I suspect Lemass 'bossed' some of his colleagues and left a quiet man like Hilliard without words when, for example, he was told that the Authority's concept of being independent of government was being pushed to an intolerable extent.

The government, Lemass insisted, had not set up the television service for the purpose of publicising criticisms of national policy, or arousing opposition to it; and it would have to be understood that national policy was what the government of the day decided it to be. Telefís Éireann would have to be entirely supportive of government policy and he would not hesitate to change the composition of the RTÉ Authority to ensure that it was.
